

He is now a lawyer: Yale '07.

An ex-Marine with an Information and Communication/Computer Specialty, who followed up on his hobby in the marines (where he keep his 6 different cars on the road and humming while stationed in Hawaii) by completing a 2 year program in Automobile Mechanics upon his return while also working 3 part time jobs and taking college courses at Middlesex Community College and at UMASS, Lowell. In the service, he went to Japan, Korea, Australia, & to a country bordering Iraqi, and had a considerable amount of shipboard duty. Immediately following his 6 year service experience, he and several ex-marine buddies did a walking tour of Europe. He is still in school. His high school physics teacher took a special interest in his high aptitude for physics. It was completely his own talent, untainted and uninfluenced by his father. He loves to tinker with computers and servers and is quite computer savvy.

She definitely cracks the whip! Ouch!

This younger son graduated from Yale Law School on 28 May 2007 (= Memorial Day = a very memorable day for us)! He immediately passed the subsequent fall bar exam in Massachusetts and his swearing in ceremony, allowing him to practice law in Massachusetts (along with 77,000 other lawyers in MA), was on 27 Nov. 2007. Afterwards, he worked for the DA's office as an Assistant D.A. in Massachusetts and also taught courses in the evenings to others on how to pass the Bar Exam. Later, after deciding that he would rather be a judge instead, he clerked for an active District Court judge in New Haven for a year. He accepted a legal job with the State Department starting in September 2009. [He graduated from Williams College in '02, did his junior year at Oxford, U. K. (yes, he didn't inhale nor even touch the stuff), and made Phi Beta Kappa (which he did not tell his parents about beforehand).]
